Q: Java: getContentPane inside JScrollPane I am trying to access getContentPane within JScrollPane. Right now, the IDE is not accepting the access to getContentPane. Any help would be appreciated. JFrame JFrame = new JFrame("My ScrollPane"); JFrame.setDefaultCloseOperation(WindowConstants.EXIT_ON_CLOSE); JScrollPane jScroll = new JScrollPane(new JTextArea("Hello, World!", 5, 25)); jScroll.setPreferredSize(new Dimension(300, 200)); JFrame.setDefaultCloseOperation(WindowConstants.EXIT_ON_CLOSE); JFrame.add(jScroll); jScroll.setPreferredSize(new Dimension(300, 200)); JFrame.pack(); JFrame.setVisible(true); jScroll.setPreferredSize(new Dimension(300, 200)); A: Use this: jScroll.getContentPane().setText("hello, world"); A: You need to use the getContentPane() method of the JScrollPane. Since you are working with a JScrollPane in the model of a JTextArea you will need to wrap the JTextArea inside a JViewport. The JViewport will in turn be wrapped by the JScrollPane. The code would look like this: JFrame JFrame = new JFrame("My ScrollPane"); JFrame.setDefaultCloseOperation(WindowConstants.EXIT_ON_CLOSE); JScrollPane jScroll = new JScrollPane(new JViewport(

Q: Is there a UI for updating an in-memory cache in Java? I've been asked to create an in-memory cache for an application that is intended to be used for a number of different types of data. In order to use the cache, it has to be updated on an asynchronous basis in response to changes that happen to the underlying data that it's caching. While it's tempting to just create some kind of XML document that lists all the data and then just parse through and copy the data as it's changed, there are also a number of considerations that makes this approach less than ideal. For example, I'd like to be able to store any number of different types of data in the cache and I'm looking for a mechanism that I can use that would allow me to handle arbitrary changes to these "types" of data. For example, I'm currently using a List, but this could easily be changed to be any other Collection type. I'd also like to be able to associate an arbitrary hash code to each of the items, so that I can quickly look up them and know which one they are. An ideal solution would have some kind of graphical user interface that let me associate a particular data type with a text label, drop down menu of allowed data values, associated hash code, etc. I'm trying to do all of this without having to create a whole new interface for the list that does all of this, because I'm afraid that once I get it working, it won't be portable enough to be reused for other tasks. Is there a framework or even just a set of tools that would allow me to handle situations like this in a more portable manner? A: I know what you mean by user interface. I have designed web application and have designed many web applications with user interface just like you want. I will start from top of your question and end up at bottom of your question. Top of your question For me I think, the major problem in your project is, the type of data that you want to cache. What's the data type, where is it coming from. And is this data a constant update? Or once in a while? If it's the second type of data and it updates in less time as compared to what you want to cache. You can try asynchronous. 1) Create a background thread and put the cache update code there and periodically update the cache (

System Requirements:

Minimum: OS: Windows 10 (64bit) Processor: Intel i5-6600K@4.5GHz or AMD Ryzen 7 1700 @4.3GHz Memory: 8GB Graphics: AMD Radeon RX 480 DirectX: 11 Hard Drive: 500GB Additional Notes: The game has a minimum resolution of 1280x720. If you are running a game with a resolution that is smaller than that then the game will be scaled to fit the screen.
